

Dear Editor:

As a former CRO of WNTC, I am well acquainted with the haphazard and lackadaisical attitude of its engineering staff toward the operation of the station. Since the station went on the air in September, I have not had the privilege of listening to it at the dormitories without hearing a loud hum several times the amplitude of the signal. I am acquainted with the equipment and record library at the station itself as well as some of the programs being presented, and it is my opinion that the cost of this equipment and the time put into the station by students presenting shows is at least worthy of transmitters which can put out a listenable signal.

I know that at least some of those on the engineering staff are capable of putting the Hill Campus transmitters into proper operation. If these men are at such a loss for time, or if it is that they just don't care, then why hasn't the WNTC Board given the job to the men who do have the time and can do the job well? Final responsibility for the proper operation of the station rests with the Board.

Sincerely yours,
Martin Rosenzweig
